Health problems in rural, This course explores the unique health challenges faced by rural communities, emphasizing the social, economic, and environmental factors that affect healthcare access and outcomes. Learners will examine common rural health problems such as malnutrition, maternal and child health issues, infectious diseases, chronic illnesses, and occupational hazards related to farming and agriculture. The course highlights barriers including limited healthcare facilities, shortage of trained professionals, poor infrastructure, and cultural beliefs influencing health-seeking behavior. Participants will also study strategies for improving rural healthcare delivery, such as community health programs, mobile clinics, telemedicine, and preventive health education. Case studies and practical examples will provide insights into sustainable solutions that address disparities between rural and urban populations. By the end of the course, learners will be equipped to analyze rural health problems critically and contribute to designing interventions that promote equity and improve the quality of life in underserved communities.
